

The Cons of Homeschooling

Lack of social development

Of the many pros and cons of homeschooling, this is among the most commonly listed “cons.” Keeping your child out of a traditional school environment greatly inhibits their access to other children. Even if your child gets plenty of playtime and other opportunities to meet and interact with people his own age, this is bound to add up to far less contact than the 30+ hours in a normal school week and can lead to home school socialization issues.

Not learning how to properly interact within a group can sometimes result in social and behavioral issues. Children may be less inclined to share, demand personal attention by acting out, or become socially awkward and anxious. Learning to make friends and exist within a group are important life lessons that children could miss out on through homeschooling.

To offset home school socialization issues parents can create a **home school schedule** that includes homeschool activities such as field trips to places of interest, involvement in sports and activities at recreation centers, and meeting other home school parents through homeschool groups.

Missed experiences

Common experiences are part of the fabric of life. These forge friendships and build memories, and may be limited in a homeschooling environment. School life is filled with plenty of exciting opportunities for children, from field trips to the prom. While you can certainly provide cultural and other opportunities while homeschooling your child, these are not the same as the child would experience in a group of his or her peers. As with the social interactions provided by a traditional school environment, the opportunity to participate in special events and other commonalities can help children better adjust in society.

Reduced competition

Competition often breeds achievement, and homeschooled children are generally not provided with competitive opportunities. Traditional schooling fixtures such as team sports, spelling bees, and school play tryouts all encourage your child to do their very best. These things give children something to strive for, and to uncover natural aptitudes that might go untapped in homeschooled environments.

While you and your child can still seek non-scholastic teams and other competitive hobbies, this generally requires prior interest in a topic. The school system, on the other hand, naturally provides several competitive paths for children to try without provocation.

While weighing the pros and cons of homeschooling, it's important to remember that you can have an impact on whichever path you choose. For example, your homeschooled children can become just as socially adept as their peers with careful planning. Children enrolled in traditional school can still benefit from the time and tutelage of an attentive parent. Only you can decide if homeschooling is the right choice for your children, but making an informed choice on the matter will put them in position for a robust educational future.

The Negative Effects and Aspects of Homeschooling

More parents are choosing to homeschool their children because they see the many benefits of homeschooling, differences in ideology and issues with public school policy are only a few reasons why some parents choose homeschooling over public or private schools. When considering enrolling a child in a homeschool curriculum, there are many different factors to consider. While there are many positive aspects of homeschooling, there are also the negative aspects of homeschooling. In this article, we will explore some of the disadvantages of homeschooling.

Time

When parents take the responsibility of educating their children at home, they may need to set aside time to make it work. The task of homeschooling a child is certainly not easy, especially for working parents, single parents or stay-at-home parents. They have to take time to organize and prepare lessons, teach, give tests, and plan field trips. Homeschooling is a full-time commitment and to make sure that the child receives a quality education, parents need to invest time and effort needed.

Cost

In comparison to public schools, where education is free, homeschooling can be costly. Purchasing the newest curriculum and teaching tools can be very expensive. Parents may choose to use a paid homeschooling program, such programs may have added benefits, but may increase the cost of the child's education. There are also other costs to keep in mind, like project materials, stationery, books, computer software, and field trips. Parents who choose to home school their children should be prepared to spend more money than parents who send their children to public schools.

Socialization

Home schooled children may not have as many opportunities to interact with other children in comparison to children who attend regular schools. Forming bonds and socializing with children their own age is important for the child's developmental health and development of social skills. If home schooled, they may be deprived of the chance to form friendships and may suffer socially. Of course, they can make friends with other home schooled children, but it is quite different when special effort has to be made to arrange meetings. The lack of socialization may affect them in later stages of life.

Lack of Facilities

It is quite impossible that a home can be as well-equipped as a regular school in terms of facilities. For classes that require experiments like physics and chemistry, it can be hard to get all the necessary chemicals, materials, apparatus, and so on. The home would also lack facilities for sports like swimming pools, running tracks, gyms, and fields.

Patience

One of the reasons why homeschooling is bad is the fact that parents may lose patience when they are trying to educate their children. Some parents may be too overbearing or impatient, which may cause the child to react in a negative manner. It is may be hard for parents to draw the line between educator and parent in the child's mind.

Motivation

One of the most glaring negative effects of homeschooling is the matter of motivation. Some children need to be challenged to excel in their studies. In this sense, they thrive when they are involved in some competition. Children who are homeschooled would not have this motivation because most of them are educated separately.

he cons in homeschooling are not that tough to figure either. Let's see the reasons why homeschooling is bad.

(-) Homeschooling can take up a lot of time of the parent, leading to an acute time restraint for the parents. Picture a kitchen table filled with books and no cooked food. The kitchen virtually turns into a study room in this case!

(-) Homeschooling requires one parent to be at home full-time. This could lead to a financial restraint on the family. The income would reduce, while the expenditure would, almost, remain the same.

(-) If a child spends most of his/her time at home, he/she would not be able to participate in team sports. He/she might not be welcomed in public school teams. Hence, parents have to make arrangements (make their own sports team), so that their children can participate in games.

(-) Another minus point would be, children studying at home, may not belong to a friends' circle, because of which they would feel lonely and isolated.

(-) You have to accept that homeschooling is an oddity. As such, in a neighborhood where most children go to a public school, one home scholar may find it hard to make friends and might find it very easy getting teased.

(-) Parents cannot deny that they have to be around their kids 24x7. If parents are not prepared for this, then homeschooling is not an option for them. However, some parents do feel that spending more time with kids helps in familial growth and bonding.

(-) Another concern would be the amount of noise or disturbance at home. The constant ringing of the doorbell or cell phone may hamper the concentration of the child who is trying to study.

What Are the Disadvantages?

People disagree about how much formal education a person needs to be a good teacher. Not all parents and homeschool tutors have gone to school to learn to teach or to learn the subject they are teaching. If a parent is well educated, he or she may understand some subjects really well but others not as well. For instance, a kid's mom may be great at chemistry but not as good at English.

To be fair, not all schoolteachers are experts in their fields either. And tutors may be used for subjects the parent isn't skilled in. If a homeschool parent or tutor doesn't know something or can't fully explain it, the instructor and student can always research the issue together. A local library, university, community college, or the Internet may have the answers.

A kid who's homeschooled doesn't have the convenience of school facilities, such as a gymnasium, science lab, or art studio. The child may be taught at the kitchen table or at a "school" area in the home. He or she might do science experiments in the kitchen or go outside to work on an art project. Some parents who homeschool their kids form groups so their kids can go together to take art classes and take part in other group learning activities, like field trips.

Effects on social life can be another possible disadvantage for homeschooled kids. All kids need to have friends and be around other children. Some homeschoolers may feel cut off from kids their age or feel like they spend too much time with their families.

Parents who homeschool their kids often make efforts to ensure their son or daughter has a social life. For instance, groups of homeschooled children may get together regularly to learn together or just socialize. And like any child, they may be on sports teams, in dance classes, or take part in other activities outside of school.

The number of parents choosing to homeschool their children is growing rapidly. There are many reasons why, but safety as well as religious concerns are at the top of the list. Many parents want the freedom to decide what curriculum their children will study as well as control the environment in which they learn. However justified, these concerns do not negate the reality that homeschooling can have long-term effects on children that are not positive.

1. Narrow Academic Focus

- Parents have basically two choices when it comes to selecting a curriculum. They can sign up with their local school district and use the curriculum already adopted, or they can choose from the many homeschool programs that exists. Many of these are faith-based. Parents having religious concerns generally prefer this type of program. Whatever the curriculum type, if it is taught by one parent, the focus is inherently narrow. That is, the parent's viewpoint supersedes any other opinion. For the short-term, this might be alright. In the long run, students will be at a disadvantage if they go to college. Having many professors with numerous opinions may be confusing.

Limited Social Exposure

- There are organizations that help homeschooling families have outside learning experiences like field trips. This does not provide the amount of social exposure that maturing children need. Parents may not like the lack of control they have over a school's environment . They also will not be able to choose who their children associate with at school. However, children need to have time away from the security of home to learn how to adjust. They need to learn that situations will arise in which they may not get their way. Time spent away from immediate family is when they can learn the art of compromise and getting along. Homeschooling with siblings provides this to an extent, but not in the same way because brothers and sister have the same prior experiences. This will not be true of all classmates at school.

Poor Preparedness

- Most colleges will make provisions for allowing the homeschooled child to attend their institutions. They may be allowed to take entrance tests or be admitted based on academic performance and/or SAT/ACT scores. Getting into college will not be too challenging. But staying and succeeding may not be as easy. There is the immediate adjustment of living away from home on a regular basis. Even if they are able to live by themselves, students will have to live within the college environment with others. This will be a huge change from the sheltered home school life. Then there is the academic struggle. Students may have excelled in homeschool studies, but unless their instructor has been a trained teacher or other highly qualified lay person, they may not be able to make the structural adjustments necessary. These include note taking, writing and extensive studying.

Lack of Opportunities

- Homeschool students will not have the same access to certain benefits that their public school counterparts do. Counselors work hard to find scholarships for which students may be eligible. They are privy to information on how to secure financial help via sources unknown to most home school parents. Again, there may be a few exceptions, but most homeschooled children will miss out on opportunities to go to the best schools or secure financial and career help through college.

Significance

- The disadvantages of homeschooling outweigh any benefits. The short-term convenience and control that the parents have now will not mean much compared to the problems their children will face in the future. Being prepared for adult life, in general, is not easy for anyone. It will prove to be much more daunting for children who have been sheltered, controlled and regimented within narrow constraints that do not in any way mirror the real world.

Disadvantages of Homeschooling. While most people who take up homeschooling are sold on its positive outcomes, it is important to consider the downside to homeschooling. Clearly, there are difficulties and disadvantages associated with homeschooling. Below are four examples.

First, the responsibility for teaching your child rests solely on you. You cannot blame anyone else if your child seems to be lagging behind on skills observed in peers. If your child cannot do the things that are expected from other children of his age group, you may have difficulty accepting your limitation as a teacher.

Second, a critical part of homeschooling is the time that you have to spend with your child. To succeed as a homeschooled, you may have to give up some of your time with friends, non-essential shopping, and certain forms of entertainment in order to dedicate additional time to your child. This can become frustrating at times. You have to learn to take the aggravation with equanimity and wait for the rewards with patience and enthusiasm.

Third, the parent who serves as a home school teacher, is unlikely to have much time to pursue an outside career. This means that personal career development, as well as the family's financial well-being, may be negatively affected. To cope with financial stress, you may have to learn to live on a more strictly controlled budget.

Fourth, if you are the primary home school teacher in your family, you cannot take a break when you feel like it. Feelings of guilt will assail you if you neglect studies just because you are feeling blue. You may also fear that the child will take advantage of the situation. Even when you have given homework, you have to be around to give a helping hand. This means that anytime your child is around you, you are on duty! For some, this may mean working every waking hour. You will have to be creative to schedule your own opportunities for outside social interactions.

Are There Social Disadvantages Of Homeschooling?

Many say there are social disadvantages of homeschooling while others counter that this is not a problem. This is an important consideration when looking at the pros and cons of homeschooling.

Examining some factors can help determine what life would be like for you when homeschooling and if lack of socialization would be a disadvantage of homeschooling in your household.

Humans, including kids, need the experience of interaction with peers - kids in the same age bracket - in order to learn how to form relationships and behave in a manner that demonstrates kindness, respect and equality.

For example - you might take your kids to the grocery store, library, park, religious meeting place, neighbor's house, field trips - that's great.

Homeschooled kids are consistently praised for communicating well with adults. However, communicating with peers is different.

When my daughter interacts with older ones, even with the age gap being as little as 5 or 6 years my daughter is kindly condescended upon - the other person let's her get away with a lot. When interacting with people around her own age her metal is tested - she learns how to work as a team member rather than viewing her peer as the competition.

Of great value are the friendships my daughter has with people a little older and a lot older than her. But, I have observed the differences from these relationships to those with her kids her age. Yes, the inexperience of a child or two or a group of them will lead to foolishness and problems at times but learning how to interact and get along with them is important.

What about siblings? Having a sibling or many is fabulous - a gift to your kids that helps a child grow. However, have you ever noticed the difference in how your child deals with her sibling compared to another child. It's so natural to take liberties with your brother or sister.

So, having discussed the importance of having regular association with other kids what kind of opportunities are realistic for your family?

For example, what kind of mobility do you have? Are you in the city or the country and do you have use of a vehicle during the day? Or, are you somewhat "stranded" at home?

What kind of motivation do you have as the parent to plan and get out of the house regularly? Are you willing to plan regular activities that will put your child in touch with others?

There are many activities you could enroll your child in where they could form friendships with other children. However, it could become very costly.

So, are there social disadvantages of homeschooling? There could be. But, it seems there doesn't have to be if you have the right circumstances and you are diligent in planning and initiating.

You parents who are homeschooling or want to homeschool are moms and dads who are willing to make sacrifices for your kids because you want what is best for your kids. That being said you no doubt want to give consideration to this important aspect of socialization when considering the pros and cons of homeschooling and whether it will work for you.
